A DMAT is a volunteer team organized under the National Disaster Medical System (NDMS) through the U.S. Public Health Service to provide emergency medical care and to augment local medical capabilities during times of disaster. Teams respond from areas not directly affected by the disaster event, so local resources will not be depleted by the activation of a team, when local team members would be needed in their own communities. Teams are usually deployed for periods of 7-14 days, depending on the mission requirements. Team members train as volunteers, but become Federal employees when deployed to a disaster site.
